This article delves into the life of John McCrae, the context in which he wrote "In Flanders Fields," and the lasting impact of the poem on war remembrance and culture.

The Life of John McCrae

John McCrae was born on November 30, 1872, in Guelph, Ontario, Canada. He was educated at the University of Toronto, where he studied medicine, graduating in 1898. His early career involved serving as a resident at Toronto General Hospital, followed by a stint in the medical field where he worked with various health organizations.

In addition to his medical career, McCrae was passionate about literature and poetry, often penning verses that reflected his thoughts and experiences. His literary talents would soon intertwine with his military service during the First World War.

Military Career and the Writing of the Poem

When World War I broke out in 1914, McCrae enlisted in the Canadian Army Medical Corps. He was quickly deployed to the front lines, where he witnessed the brutal realities of war. His experiences during the Second Battle of Ypres in 1915 were particularly significant, as they provided the backdrop for "In Flanders Fields."

The poem was inspired by the death of McCrae's close friend, Lieutenant Alexis Helmer, who was killed in battle. McCrae performed the burial service for Helmer and was deeply moved by the sight of poppies growing in the fields where soldiers had fallen. This imagery became central to his poem, which he wrote on May 3, 1915, while sitting in the trenches.
