Overview of Motivational Interviewing

Motivational interviewing (MI) is a client-centered, directive method for enhancing intrinsic motivation to change by exploring and resolving ambivalence. Developed by clinical psychologists William R. Miller and Stephen Rollnick, MI is widely used in health care, addiction treatment, mental health, and social services. The approach emphasizes collaboration, evocation, and autonomy support, making it a respectful and effective way to encourage behavior change. Understanding the foundational principles and spirit of motivational interviewing is essential for anyone undertaking training in this methodology.

History and Development

The origins of motivational interviewing date back to the 1980s, initially focusing on addiction counseling. Since then, it has evolved into a versatile counseling style applicable to a variety of behavioral challenges. The approach is grounded in psychological theories of motivation and change, aiming to strengthen an individual's commitment to positive behavior changes.

Key Principles

The four core principles of motivational interviewing include expressing empathy through reflective listening, developing discrepancy between clients' goals and current behavior, rolling with resistance rather than confronting it directly, and supporting self-efficacy to empower change. These principles guide the interactions between counselor and client throughout the change process.
